Bowling for Columbine is an interactive participatory documentary written, produced, and directed by Michael Moore, a nationally recognized documentary writer who went on to create Fahrenheit 9/11, a film critical of President George W. Bush and the war on terror. Michael Moore directed the documentary Bowling for Columbine. Moore's primary emphasis was the Columbine High School shooting. In 1999, two oblivious youngsters killed one instructor and 12 pupils. Moore also attempted to interview people whose lives had been impacted by guns. "Moore's argument, which he subsequently developed in Fahrenheit 9/11, is that the fear-mongering that pervades American culture leads to our epidemic of gun violence," Farber said of the film. Moore presents news articles from Canada that do not adhere to the "if it bleeds, it leads" attitude.

The title alludes to the fact that Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold attended a school bowling lesson at 6:00 a.m. on the day of the attacks. Later investigations revealed that this was based on false memories, and Glenn Moore of the Golden Police Department decided that they had been missing from school. Moore believes that bowling might have been as much to blame for the school assaults as Marilyn Manson or President Bill Clinton, both of whom conducted bombing raids on Serbia at the time. Bowling For Columbine, a documentary by Michael Moore, examines gun violence in the United States and finds that there is no link between gun ownership and gun violence. He claims that fear causes Americans to arm themselves, which benefits gun makers. Moore cynically implies that bowling may have been just as culpable for the school assaults as Marilyn Manson or Bill Clinton. Filmmaker Michael Moore pays a visit to Charlton Heston's house in Hollywood for an up-close and personal interview in which he questions him on American firearm violence. Heston's lengthy answer includes the assertion that the United States has a "history of violence" and a greater "mixed ethnicity" than other countries, which he believes leads to the country's increasing violent crime. When Moore starts asking aggressive questions about his participation in NRA rallies and support for gun ownership, Heston storms out of the interview and orders Moore and his film team to leave his residence.

Michael Moore, a political documentary filmmaker, investigates the events that led to the 1999 Columbine High School tragedy, as well as the proliferation of weapons and America's high homicide rate. Moore confronts Kmart corporate officials and begs them to stop selling ammunition, examines why Canada does not have the same high incidence of gun violence, and challenges actor Charlton Heston about his support for the National Rifle Association. Bowling For Columbine is a documentary that looks at gun violence in the United States. Fear, according to Michael Moore, drives Americans to arm themselves, which favors gun manufacturers. Michael Moore, a filmmaker, pays a visit to Charlton Heston's home in Hollywood for an up-close-and-personal interview.