Poverty Leads to Violence

The truth is poverty is not just a lack of money—it has many complicated dimensions that result in both physical and emotional problems. The physical effects include malnutrition, poor health, lack of housing, and other poverty-related conditions. The emotional effects are felt within the individual's family, friends, and community.

But before I go into these dimensions of poverty, let me first share some types of poverty that lead to violence. I will call out specific examples where they are most common, but first I want to provide an overview for those who are unfamiliar with the concept.

Poverty often has many dimensions. Here are four I use to define it—unemployment, single parenthood, lack of education, and drug/alcohol abuse/addiction. Poverty can be caused by any or all these factors at different times in a person's life. But when a person is living in poverty for a long period, the physical and emotional effects lead to violence.

Unemployment. The percentage of people unemployed is usually 2–7 times higher among those living below the poverty line than those who are not poor. Even those who have had jobs but can't find them can also become violent as they deal with the economic pressures on themselves, and their families caused by unemployment. They become desperate and will do anything to feed their families, including crime and violence. For example, in some cities, unemployed people will steal to feed their families. When they get caught, the police will arrest them, and they will be sent to jail, where they will be treated as criminals.

Single parenthood. Children from single-parent homes have a higher rate of poverty and violence than those from two-parent homes; they are also more likely to live in low-income neighborhoods where the chance of encountering gangs is greater.

Lack of education. It is no secret that poverty is the greatest foe of education at all levels. Students from low-income families are more likely to suffer from health problems. The youngsters' capacity to study and learn is affected by their poor existence. Getting the correct education can not only raise individuals out of poverty, but it can also improve their health, solve their financial problems, and alter their life.

Drug/alcohol abuse/addiction. The link between addiction and violence is well documented. In many ways, drug use is a symptom of poverty; drugs are often used to temporarily relieve the pain of unemployment or to fill the void of loneliness or broken relationships. In addition, many people addicted to alcohol and other drugs are often unemployed and homeless. The cycle of poverty, violence, and addiction is a vicious cycle. It is not difficult to see the four kinds of links between poverty and violence that I have described. Research shows that poverty causes all these

This study examines crime and poverty via the victimization lens. Even if there is a correlation between poverty and committing crimes, is there also a link between poverty and becoming a victim of crime? If this is the case, how much more likely are the poor and those living in poverty? To be a victim of crime in the lowest areas? What might a kinder attitude to the impoverished minority look like? How do people who commit a lot of crimes affect their law-abiding neighbors? Would a stronger stance on Does crime disproportionately benefit those who have the least? Torture and cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment are in many ways it has to do with ignoring human rights. Reducing the level of violence in each society is a key step in ensuring that the world enjoys rights. Conflict and lack of security in the Philippines the conditions of the Filipinos significantly limit their abilities Get rid of poverty and raise children. The country's economic progress has not kept up Wealth is distributed equally, so there is no contribution Great help to poverty reduction. The armed uprising provided a Means for affected groups and people deprived of their rights The community expresses their concerns and meets their needs need. These sports are particularly active in Southern Philippines, driven by social consciousness Injustice, and exclusion. Sustainable urbanization is a key issue Philippines, it needs a multifaceted and comprehensive strategy.

Why poverty leads to violence is important to society as a whole To reduce the prevalence of violence, we should identify the key factors and target the main reasons accordingly. The direct factors leading to poverty and violence are lack of opportunity, lack of education, and lack of a decent standard of living. Poverty has a direct impact on all of these. As poverty and inequality become more entrenched, people are increasingly eager to solve the problem. To obtain resources for survival, we may become more willing to commit crimes. Because of this, we are also more likely to have violent conflicts with others. In other words, when we face more social and economic challenges, we are more likely to become violent.
